

RESTAURANTUERS GATHER FOR SEATTLE MEET
SEATTLE, WA

Former CIA chief Stansfield Turner during the Carter administration plans a timely address on combating world terrorism during a keynote address this weekend at the Pacific International Restaurant Convention in Seattle.

Turner, who has presented often controversial views regarding the role of terrorism in the world, is the speaker at the group's Sunday luncheon at the Westin Hotel.

His speech will come just four days after a terrorist bomb blew a hole in the side of a TWA jet above Athens, blasting four people to their deaths and injuring nearly a dozen others.

Bill Dugovich, spokesman for the Restaurant Association of Washington, said more than 27,000 people are expected to attend the four-day convention and exposition at the Seattle Center, hotels and restaurants spread throughout the downtown area.

Another non-industry speaker will be Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., who this week announced his intention to seek a second six-year term as the Washington's senior senator.

His address will cover Congress, tax reform, and will precede the introduction of astronaut George Nelson of Clinton, Iowa, who has twice traveled on the space shuttle.

But the remainder of the convention will be dedicated to the trade of serving people, Dugovich said.

Among the other prominent guests will be convention co-chairmen Bruce Attebery, president of the Black Angus Management Corp., and Victor Rosellini, Seattle's prominent restaurant owner and past president of the National Restaurant Association.

The 1986 exposition will include exhibits and displays at the Coliseum, Flag Plaza Pavilion, exhibition Hall and North Concourse, will be the largest in the history of the restaurant show since it was first held in 1949.
